

Art

- The child has learned about diversity and inclusion by creating people of different sizes and races using playdough.
- Through this activity, the child has developed fine motor skills by molding and shaping the playdough to represent different people.
- Creating people with playdough can inspire creativity and imagination in the child as they explore the different features and expressions of their playdough characters.

Physical Education

- The child has engaged in tactile and sensory experiences by manipulating the playdough, which can contribute to their physical development.
- By using different body parts to mold the playdough, the child has practiced hand-eye coordination and dexterity.
- This activity promotes body awareness as the child imagines, creates, and interacts with different representations of people using the playdough.

Social Studies

- The child has been introduced to the concept of diversity and cultural representation as they create people of different races using playdough.
- Through this activity, the child may begin to understand and appreciate differences in physical appearances and develop empathy towards others.
- By creating diverse playdough people, the child can initiate conversations about inclusivity and the celebration of different cultures and backgrounds.

Encourage the child to further develop their creativity and understanding of diversity by discussing the features and characteristics of the playdough people they have created. Ask questions that promote critical thinking and empathy, such as "What makes each person unique?" or "How can we celebrate our differences?" Additionally, provide opportunities for the child to explore cultural diversity through stories, music, and art from various cultures.

Book Recommendations

- All Are Welcome by Alexandra Penfold: This book celebrates diversity and inclusion in a school setting, promoting the idea that everyone is welcome and valued regardless of race, religion, or background.
- The Colors of Us by Karen Katz: This story follows a young girl as she explores the different shades of skin colors in her vibrant neighborhood, celebrating diversity and self-acceptance.
- Round is a Mooncake by Roseanne Thong: Through this book, children learn about shapes and objects in the context of the Chinese American culture, promoting cultural awareness and appreciation.

If you click on these links and make a purchase, we may receive a small commission.