

Imagine being a student in Australia where you are learning exciting things that help you understand the world better! In the New South Wales (NSW) Australian Curriculum, you are taught how to express your thoughts and feelings about important topics like things happening in your own life, in your community, and even around the world.

Now, when the school asks you to 'respond to and compose texts that explore personal, social and world issues,' they want you to use your creativity and feelings to talk about things that matter to you. For example, think about when you read a story about a character who helps others in need. You can write your own story about helping someone in your family or community, showing how kindness is important in the world.

Another way to do this is by writing a diary entry about a time when you felt happy, sad, or excited. You can share your personal experiences and show how emotions play a big role in our lives. This helps you understand yourself better and how you can connect with others.

When you listen to news or watch documentaries about events happening in the world, you can also write about your thoughts and opinions on these issues. For example, if you learn about people helping to clean up the environment, you can write a letter to your local government suggesting ways to keep your area clean and green.

By exploring personal, social, and world issues through writing, you are not only improving your language skills but also learning how to share your ideas and make a positive impact on the world around you. So, next time you are asked to 'respond to and compose texts,' remember to be creative, share your feelings, and think about how you can make a difference!
