

Dear young learner, let's explore how students in New South Wales can understand how cultural ideas and perspectives influence different types of texts like stories, articles, pictures, and videos. Imagine you are like a detective investigating how the beliefs and customs of different groups of people impact the way they communicate with others.

For example, think about how a story can change based on the culture it comes from. A fairy tale told in Australia might have different characters and settings compared to one from Japan. This shows how the cultural background of the storyteller can shape the narrative.

Similarly, when you read an article or watch a video, pay attention to the values and traditions being shared. A news report from a country with different customs than yours may present information in a way that reflects their cultural norms.

By looking closely at these various texts, you will begin to notice how cultural ideas influence the way people express themselves. This skill will help you understand and appreciate the diverse perspectives that exist in our world.

So, as a student in New South Wales, you can learn to appreciate and analyze how cultural ideas and viewpoints impact the texts you encounter, whether they are spoken, written, visual, or multimedia. Isn't it exciting to see how stories and information can be shaped by the richness of different cultures?
