

Porcupines are animals with sharp, pointy quills all over their bodies. These quills are like tiny, hard needles that stick out to protect the porcupine.

Imagine wearing a costume made of spikes that stop anyone from touching you. That's what the porcupine's quills do! If a bigger animal tries to catch or hurt the porcupine, it might get poked by these sharp quills. The quills make it hard for the animal to bite or grab the porcupine, so the porcupine stays safe.

Also, if a porcupine feels scared, it can shake its quills, making a rattling sound. This warns other animals to stay away. So, porcupine quills are like a special kind of armor that helps the porcupine protect itself every day.
