

To determine the meaning of "helicopter parent," it's important to choose the detail from the article that best hints at a parent who is overly involved or controlling in their child's life.

Let's analyze the options:

- A. "Everywhere, it seems, the thinking has changed,' the New York Times reported, on April 22, 1990." This sentence is vague and does not directly relate to parenting styles.
- B. "He was happy to let anyone organize whatever they want and call it whatever they want,' Rome said." This suggests a more hands-off or permissive attitude, which contrasts with the notion of a helicopter parent.
- C. "Another reason Earth Day 1970 was so powerful is that it brought together 'the power of the establishment and the energy and boldness of the grassroots,' Rome said." This refers to a historical event and collective action, unrelated to parenting.
- D. "The young people at the time 'thought they could really change the world,' Rome said." This highlights youth optimism but does not give clues about parenting behavior.

None of the given options is a direct definition of "helicopter parent." However, option B contrasts with the concept by indicating a parent who allows others to take charge, which implies that a helicopter parent would instead be controlling and involved.

Therefore, the best clue comes from option B, as it indirectly helps you understand the meaning through contrast: a helicopter parent would not be "happy to let anyone organize whatever they want," but would instead closely supervise and manage their child's activities.
