

Hey there! Have you ever seen a frilled lizard? It's a reptile that lives in places like Australia and Papua New Guinea. One of its coolest features is the large frill around its neck, which looks like a big, colorful fan.

Now, here's what happens if you suddenly surprise or scare a frilled lizard, like by saying "Boo!" It quickly opens up that big frill, making it look much bigger and more frightening. This is called fanning its frill.

Why does it do this? Well, the frill makes the lizard look much bigger and more powerful than it really is. This helps to scare away animals that might want to eat or hurt it. It's like when you raise your arms to look bigger and someone might think twice before bothering you!

Besides looking bigger, the bright colors in the frill can surprise enemies, giving the lizard time to escape. So, fanning the frill is a smart way the lizard protects itself without fighting.

Isn't nature amazing? The frilled lizard has found a clever way to stay safe using its neck fan!
