

Okay, little buddy! You know how when you play with your toy airplane, you pretend to fly it in the sky? Well, a control room is a special place where people help real airplanes take off and land safely.

Imagine if all your toys were flying in the sky. Someone would need to make sure they don't crash into each other, right? That's what the people in the control room do!

They talk to the pilots, who are the ones flying the planes, and tell them where to go, when to take off, and when to land. They use big screens to see all the airplanes flying around. It's like a video game, but for real planes!

So, control room flights mean the work that happens in the control room to make sure all the airplanes fly safely. Isn't that cool?
