

Hello! Today, we're going to discuss a recent inquiry regarding app development made by Bulgarians, along with the decision reached after a discussion with Mr. Bulatsky. Let's break it down step by step.

Step 1: Understanding the Inquiry

The Bulgarians approached us, likely seeking to either develop an app ourselves or to partner in an app development initiative. This could involve creating an application that meets specific needs or addresses a market gap in Bulgaria.

Step 2: Engaging in Discussion

After receiving the inquiry, it was essential to gather insights and perspectives from key individuals in the company. I discussed the matter with Mr. Bulatsky—a pivotal figure in our team—who provided valuable input on our current capacity and strategic direction.

Step 3: Evaluating Our Capabilities

In the discussion, we assessed our resources, both in terms of manpower and finances, and determined whether we have the capacity to take on the app development project. Factors like the technology stack needed, the timeline, and potential returns on investment were considered.

Step 4: Reaching a Decision

After careful deliberation, it was concluded that currently, pursuing app development—whether directly or through a partnership—is not feasible. This decision likely stems from our present commitments and the focus required for ongoing projects that demand our immediate attention and resources.

Step 5: Communicating the Decision

It's essential to communicate this decision back to the Bulgarians transparently and thoughtfully. They should understand our current stance while potentially keeping the door open for future collaborations. Conveying this professionally can help maintain a positive relationship for any future inquiries.

In conclusion, while the inquiry for app development was engaging and promising, the practicalities of our current situation have led to a cautious approach. It's crucial in business to know when to embrace new opportunities and when to prioritize existing commitments.