

Imagine you have a favorite toy, and you always play with it in your bedroom. The toy itself is like the main character in a story, but the bedroom is the context. It's the background or setting that helps make the story of your playtime with the toy more complete.

Now, let's pretend you are playing with your toy truck. The context includes your bedroom, the other toys around, the time of day, and even what you ate for lunch. All of these things influence how you play and what you imagine while playing with your toy truck.

Think of context as the big picture around a specific thing happening. It helps us understand why something is the way it is and how different elements connect to make a complete story or situation. Context gives meaning to the things we see, hear, or experience.

For example, if you see a bird flying in the sky, the context could be that it's a sunny day, the bird is looking for food, or it's migrating to a warmer place. All these details around the bird flying help us understand why it's happening.

Simply put, context is like the background music in a movie. It sets the tone, adds depth, and helps us make sense of the main action or story. Without context, everything might seem random or confusing. With context, everything falls into place like pieces of a puzzle.
