

A paragraph is like a small story made up of different parts. Think of it as a sandwich with different layers. The first part of a paragraph is the topic sentence, which is like the top bun of the sandwich. This sentence tells the reader what the paragraph will be about. For example, if the paragraph is about cats, the topic sentence could be 'Cats make great pets because they are playful and cuddly'.

The next part of a paragraph is the supporting sentences, which are like the fillings of the sandwich. These sentences provide more details and examples to explain the topic sentence. For our cat paragraph, supporting sentences could talk about the different breeds of cats, their behavior, and how to take care of them.

Transition words are another important part of a paragraph. These words are like the mayo or mustard that helps the sandwich ingredients stick together. They show the relationship between ideas and help the paragraph flow smoothly. Words like 'firstly,' 'in addition,' and 'finally' are examples of transition words.

The conclusion sentence is the last part of a paragraph, like the bottom bun of the sandwich. This sentence wraps up the paragraph and restates the main idea. It could summarize the key points or provide a closing thought. In our cat paragraph, the conclusion sentence could be 'Overall, cats are wonderful companions for people of all ages'.

So, remember, a paragraph has a topic sentence, supporting sentences, transition words, and a conclusion sentence. Just like a sandwich has a top bun, fillings, condiments, and a bottom bun. Putting these parts together creates a delicious and well-structured paragraph!
