

Well, imagine Doctor Strange as a magical superhero who can do really cool things with his magic, like making portals to teleport to different places, creating shields for protection, or even manipulating time itself. He uses what he calls 'space magic' to bend and control the fabric of space and reality around him.

For example, let's say Doctor Strange needs to go from New York to London in a split second. He can create a portal by using his space magic, which is like opening a magical doorway that takes him instantly to his destination. It's like opening a secret door and stepping through to a brand new place. It's very handy when you're in a hurry.

Another way Doctor Strange uses his space magic is by creating magical shields to protect himself from danger. Imagine being in a storm and having a magical umbrella that shields you from the rain - that's what his magical shields do, but with all sorts of magical energy to keep him safe from harm.

Lastly, Doctor Strange can manipulate time with his space magic, allowing him to see into the past, present, and future. It's like having a magical time machine that lets him learn from the past, predict the future, or even make changes to the present by altering time itself. He can use this power to correct mistakes, prevent disasters, or just have a really good idea of what's coming next.

So, in simple terms, Doctor Strange uses his space magic to create portals for teleportation, shields for protection, and manipulate time for various purposes. It's like having a set of magical tools that help him navigate the world and combat evil forces in the most extraordinary ways.
